Read the passage below and answer the following question.

A new museum in Sweden is exhibiting what it says are the most disgusting foods from all around the world. Yet the people behind the project say it's not a food freak show but proof that the notion of disgust is radically different from country to country.

“Disgust is completely subjective, ” curator Samuel West told the BBC. “Seeing your own foods on display right next to some rotting fish that someone else thinks is a delicacy will challenge your own ideas of what is disgusting.”

“Even within one culture, the line between disgusting and delicacy can be very narrow,” he explains. “Oysters or smelly cheese are considered to be a delicacy – but many people in the very country where that food comes from find it very disgusting.”
